

WITH THE BELGIANS AT WIMBLEDON.

By PERRIN. Postman.(Written expressly for the S. M. Herald.)

LONDON, JULY 15TH, 1867.

all the fine buildings in London were collected, and tastefully arranged on sites on which they could be seen, instead of being dropped at random, as at present, much as birds drop seed, and often broken up in narrowest thoroughfares or cours de sa, in which no one unaccustomed with opulence or simple wealth of anything but the most vulgar or mud-splashed, scratches, notched, chalked, shoulder-rubbed, or finger-daubed basements,—an Englishman would have no reason to blush for the architectural reputation of his metropolis. He might even turn the tables on some of those who now sneer at the ugliness of his chief city. But London, as it is in its entirety, is—even the veriest cockney must confess—a hideous place, well meriting the score which Mr. Tennyson has heaped upon it in his Ode. Oxford lecture, reported in the Morning Herald, has a moral interest which no other city can boast, arising from the millions of all sorts and conditions of men that are excused even within its far-extending borders, but material greatness, in an artistic point of view, it can only claim, as a whole, in consideration of its "magnificent distances," and when you wander along many of these, and note the prim rows of crab-pot-holes, and the warrens of human rat-runs with which the space is filled, more than can appeal to the aesthetic element of your composition.

Such as London is, however, it is doing its best just now to appear brilliant. Almost everywhere you come upon a rash of varicoloured bunting. Even dull, dingy, by-streets in Somers Town, and similar localities, have hung out their banners, and look for their pains very much like colliers in their Sunday flannel. Washed flags, and painted emblems, are the chief ornaments. Almost everywhere, as I have said, are starting from church tower, house-top, and window, or hung in a string across the roadways. The white Turkish crescent protecting its white star in a blood-red sky, and the Belgian tricolour are the predominating symbols. We are entertaining simultaneously the Sultan, his nominal vassal, the Viceroy of Egypt, and the Guards, Chiviques and Volunteer Chasseurs of Belgium—and, south to say, we are making an English rathe than a Benjamin's rat. The Sultan's forces are the ruler of a State, surely doomed to crush under the sun to set eight, who are treating with a deferentially assumption of splendour that makes even his lazy, opal Oriental optics expand into the "eyes of astonishment." The Viceroy, because Egypt helped us to save our Indian Empire, and could still make us look very queer if she threw herself into the arms of any rival of England, and stopped our Suez route, because her ruler lavished hospitality on the Prince of Wales, and treated Englishmen like princes, are doing their best to snub and worry. The Prince of Wales was to have met his whilom host at Charing Cross, but preferred to go instead to a Greenwich fish-dinner. Had not the whole Press cried shame, and Lord Dudley come to the rescue with the proffer of his mansion, the Government would have sent the Viceroy to a bed at a public-house? When he made his appearance at the Zoological Gardens, the upper ten thousand cheered him down the path, and finally chanted him to his carriage, just as if he had been a popular Chartist. The Queen, who had been an ape, fear might have kept back the polished toes of the people who trod upon his heels. In the case of the Belgians, a general wish was felt to repute, and, if possible, to eclipse, the hospitality which they showed upon our Volunteers in Belgium; but in their case also, although England claims hospitality and practicality as national characteristics par excellence, we have managed, up to the present, to appear as if we were a poor and muddling. Fortunately there are receptions in store for the Belgians that little short of sudden universal lunacy can spoil; but hitherto, I repeat, we have made a miserable muddle of our welcome. We sent a crack crewship to bring the Belgians over, but big as she was, she was not big enough for the numbers we knew were coming, she did not anchor within a score of miles of the place at which they expected to embark, and, as they waited, the night was pitchy, and a great many hands on deck, and, instead of getting into the boat, they might give a fraction of the foreigners an approximation to enough to eat. At Wimledon, as I shall presently relate, there was another faux in the eating-and-drinking line, and this morning the papers announce that the London Rowing Clubs, for some unstated reason, have at the eleventh hour declined to keep their promise made in the official Reception Programme to pull up the river in honour of the Belgians.

In spite of all the blunders, past, present, and to come, it was, however, a pretty sight to see the little fleet of river-steamers, that brought up the two thousand and a half of Belgians from Gravesend, pass under London Bridge last Thursday afternoon. The bridge was blocked with vehicles, and black with gapers. All neighbouring windows, wharves, dumplings, and moored craft were crowded to the last of standing-room. A venturesome spectators sat on the railings, and, with their backs to the battlements, and ranged over periodically from the chimneys their single arms embrasured. The sky was blue, the sun was bright, and the brown river danced into beauty in the dimpling golden light. Flags were flying everywhere, both ashore and abeam. Roar after roar of cheers, from bank and bulwark, greeted the strangers as they came up, packed like herrings in the little boats, that rolled as if every minute about to capsized. Cannon boomed all along the boats approached the bridge, the people burst into a burst of hurrahs as they entered and emerged from its shadow, and heartily did the Belgians respond—those who could get their punison arms free waving white handkerchiefs, plumed shakos, and flashing gun-barrels and sword-bayonets above their heads. When the last boat had passed, the bridge-occupants "washed with a mighty upwelling" on the wharfs at which the Belgians were to land. Suddenly, and without any warning, the strangers struggled up the river-side bank, and straggled to their quarters. From the City to Westminster the streets were soon alive with cheering, and the three thousand, who had been waiting in the little boats, that rolled as if every minute about to capsized, were constantly saluting, green and blue uniforms, in pairs and half-doors, or jammed almost as tightly as aboard the boats in and on omnibuses and cabs.

For the Belges seemed such a good-tempered lot that they dragged themselves to run over to see them in full feather at Wimledon.

Barring the driver and conductor, I was the only Englishman in or on the omnibus which bore my Strand-wards last Saturday morning. The other passengers were all Belgians. The rain was falling dismally, but those who sat outside with me grinned as if they thought moist knifeboard a bed of roses. Snapping, chattering, laughing, perpetually saluting, everywhere, in an English military uniform, passed or was taking—commonly, I suppose, the jolly fellows jolted over their stony stones, as dirt and drizzle added to their enjoyment. With a smile that reached from ear to ear, a bow that brought his nose down to his knees, and a splutter of what I suppose was Flemish—it sounded very much like Jew-English—my nearest neighbour declined the proffer of my umbrella as a shelter for himself, but accepted it for protection for his rifle, into the muzzle of which he had a narrow leather bottle cork. The Belgians, still saluting, got down to the omnibus in the quadrangle of Somerset House, and I made my way towards the Waterloo Station. The Waterloo Road, notwithstanding the rain, was crowded with expectant spectators. The station was besieged. The booking-office was crammed with civilians and English volunteers of all arms and uniforms. To save time, the clerks were stamping Wimledon return tickets on spot, in sheets of half a dozen. Everyone was pressing the good-tempered of the Belgians, and, as far as I could see, with indifference or negligence of the Corporation. A member of a swell English Volunteer Corps was mincingly informing his friends that "we" meant to give the foreigners a very different kind of spread. Well, goin' to feed two hundred of them aw. Our best bill will be no joke, aw. They are rare fellahs for parades and battah babbah. I saw one fellah, aw, punish seven galls of Bass, aw, in half an hour. They won't touch much wine, aw, but stuck to birah beer and pastaw."

Before our train left the station, the Belgians filed in, and filled the huge "special" in readiness for them. Alongside the opposite platform another special started for Putney, freighted with the Prince of Wales' Hon. Artillery Company guard of honour. The Grenadier-like bears' skins and scarlet tunics were enthusiastically cheered by the Belgians as they rolled past them, and, in spite of its motley load, our train came in for almost as warm a compliment.

Before we reached Wimledon we had run out of the sun, and rushed into sunshine that made the pleasant Surrey country look doubly pretty. In an apparently interminable ant-swarm the passengers surged up from the little station. A regiment of Rifles was drawn up outside as a guard of honour for the Belgians on their arrival. Horse and foot police were dotted here and there along the hill that leads up to the town. In the road, a battery of Volunteer Artillery, 1st Surrey—as soldier-like as any regiments with salutes in the欢迎 of the welcome with a salute. Buses, horse-four-seated cabs, flys, carriages, various vehicles of every kind, were rattling up and down the road. On the housetops there was a constant stream of passengers, often stagnating into little lakes. The windows and gardens, lucious with flowering limes, of the pretty villas that line the road were thronged. Here and there gates had been taken off their hinges, and sloping tiers of seats placed in their stead, on which sat lively, light-clad little children, looking very much like the foreigner who had her petticoats all round about. It had broken out in triumph arches of flowers and evergreens, a perfect blaze of bunting, and a profusion of complimentary mottoes woven or painted in Belgian colours. The artist, mounted on a ladder, was proudly giving the finishing touch to "Dieu protège nos fils," when we went past. Normally the Belgians seemed as pensive as the old woman who had her petticoats all round about. It had broken out in triumph arches of flowers and evergreens, a perfect blaze of bunting, and a profusion of complimentary mottoes woven or painted in Belgian colours. The artist, mounted on a ladder, was proudly giving the finishing touch to "Dieu protège nos fils," when we went past.

As we went along, the Belges were a constant stream of "Oohs" and "Aahs."

THE ENGLISH SINGERS IN PARIS.

(From the Christian World.)

In connection with the great French Exhibition it was announced that a choral contest on a colossal scale would take place for a prize of £2000 and an emblematic wreath. Invitations to take part in the competition were accordingly forwarded to the various choral associations of Belgium, Germany, Switzerland, and other countries, the only restriction imposed being that none of the choristers should be professional singers. In England the challenge was at once accepted by the Tonie Sol-fa Association, the committee of which forthwith organised a competition choir of seventy male and female voices under the direction of Mr. J. T. T. Parker. The competition had to be held in estimation in which English choral singing was held on the Continent, the experiment appeared all but hopeless, especially when it became public that the famous body of singers known as the "Cologne Union" would probably join the competing choirs. Nevertheless, the Tonie Sol-fa were determined to make an effort, not were they in the least moved from their resolve when they learnt that, from some reason or another, they would form the only body of English singing in the competition.
